Land use change in northern China to contribute to soil moisture and surface air temperature variability. Land use change (LUC) in northern China for the past decades has been the primary source of emission of greenhouse gases (GHGs) and energy consumption. Soil moisture (SM), an important component of atmospheric moisture and energy balance in arid and semi-arid regions, is sensitive to land use change (LUC), and thus, LUC will strongly affect SM variation in northern China. Here, we developed two models to simulate SM and air temperature (AT) variability based on meteorological and land use data from March to October of 2011 for the LUC of northern China over the past three decades. Model results showed that the soil moisture reduction areas mainly concentrated in the Inner Mongolia Plateau, the Nanjiang River basin, and the Mongolian Plateau. The estimated average SM change was -0.21% yr<sup>-1</sup>, which was -0.29% yr<sup>-1</sup> in the dry season and -0.12% yr<sup>-1</sup> in the wet season. The LUC-induced SM change in the dry season ranged from 0.03% yr<sup>-1</sup> for the southwestern areas to 0.19% yr<sup>-1</sup> for the far eastern areas. During the dry season, the MgH<sub>2</sub>O change ranged from -0.12% yr<sup>-1</sup> in the southwest to 0.12% yr<sup>-1</sup> in the far east. SM changes along the transport path were opposite to AT changes. During the wet season, the LUC-induced SM change ranges were similar to the estimated average SM change (i.e., -0.11% yr<sup>-1</sup>). The estimated SM changes in the southwest are correlated with increased variations in thermal radiation. The estimated LUC-induced SM change in the dry season was affected by precipitation and soil moisture in the northwest area. This study has shown that LUC in northern China could lead to changes in SM and AT variability in arid and semi-arid regions. Lymphoepithelioma-like squamous cell carcinoma of the liver. A rare variety of hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) composed of large epithelioid cells with a prominent lymphoid background is described. The tumor cells were negative for keratin AE1/AE3, CAM5.2, BerEP4, vimentin, B-cell markers, carcinoembryonic antigen (CEA), and alpha-fetoprotein (AFP).

What's New In?

Yes, the tagline on this song is so bad, but it's a little hard to notice. I call it the wasabi record, and, if you can't tell from the title, it's a mashup of a Chris Brown and an M-I-Z-Z-I song. The vocals are what make the song, though, since they are sourced from the game, 'A Boojum's Greetings. If you can't tell what the song is all about, there's a short Wikipedia description that details it. The source code can be downloaded at the bottom of the post, so that you can try it out yourself. It's easy enough to modify; if you see that it's not translated in the right way, just add the text and '&bar1' to the end, or delete that part of the code. Enjoy! Note to those who got stuck on the actual tagline (1) play the game and get the achievement: "I saw IT! I won the game" and (2) the tagline and chorus are in "word" Well, that sucks. I found out about this tagline by accident, and after 10 minutes of thinking of a way to find something about it on the web, finally came across this thread. I thought I could easily figure out the solution, but it seems I couldn't. What's the damn web about, anyway? That's exactly what I thought when I saw this piece of news. I've gotten to where I understand the concept of the game, but it's not working on any browser...I have one too, and I've yet to get the GameGuard protect, I don't have money for it. Perhaps it's just for fun mode, perhaps the tagline and chorus are too hard? I've gotten past level one (which has a timer), but that's about it.
